Just a note: When I worked in color, I always thought jpegs were better than pix. You lose far more with the latter format, and if you're looking for the greatest "resolution", you'll be disappointed. But if you look at your files as a series of simple color components and just look for the best way to put them together, you really won't be disappointed at all—as long as your design and art direction allows for it. If you're working in CMYK, you can of course convert your image to either RGB or CMYK to play with—but if you're working with a dark paper stock, for example, you'll find it hard to read if you lose the dark value, not to mention you'll end up with a rather dull shade of black. And if you're working with a textured photo, you may have a hard time creating or recognizing the subtle gradations of color. If you have a lot of paints or brushes to play with or draw with, you may be able to get away with a pix. But blend modes do such a great job of getting the right color—and it's fun to play. Blending modes are good for containing unwanted color, but you'll lose the sharpness, too. Attaching high-resolution type can be a pain, and it can also be time-consuming. That's why I love the magical power of Adobe Typekit. Just like a community of type designers, Typekit hires freelancers to create fonts, and when you find the perfect one, you can buy it outright or choose to purchase a subscription. Adobe Revel is a prototyping tool that was acquired by Adobe just last year for $2.4 billion, and with good reason. When you want to build a web interface, a form, a widget—whatever—you need a way to quickly produce a prototype and test it. Once you're happy with the results, you could export the layout to HTML, CSS, or use Photoshop to format your prototype's look. Revel will also let you easily generate layouts for mobile, tablets, and surveillance screens.
